Belittling road opponents is sad

Dear Editor:

I would like to respond to Suzanne Wolf's Guest Commentary article dated Feb. 1.

Ms. Wolf makes light of the freeway problem with the examples she uses in her article. Whatever the reasons Ahwatukee residents have for, or against, the freeway are their reasons. Writing an article to belittle those in favor of the freeway only shows her lack of journalist talent.

What she failed to mention in her article is those 400 home owners knew what the situation was before they moved in. Now, with the real prospect of having their homes demolished for the risk they took is their problem, and not the rest of Ahwatukee's or the Valley's. They brought this upon themselves, and spinning it any other way doesn't change that fact, Ms. Wolf.

Then again, perhaps you're not interested in the real story, or the truth?

Buying a house near a freeway?

Dear Editor:

In your Feb. 3 issue, a representative of Protecting Arizona's Resources and Children describes ADOT's freeway planning as "irresponsible."

When someone decides to live in an area that has been publicly designated as a freeway corridor since 1988, who is the "irresponsible" one? Common sense: The easiest way to avoid living next to a freeway, if someone thinks this is a bad thing, is to not live next to where one is going to be built.
